Screenshots:Q: Render the foreign key of a Django model to the context of a "generic" Django view I have the following model: class Photo(models.Model): uploader = models.ForeignKey('account.User') In my Django view, I want to automatically assign a handler to the uploader field on each and every model instance that it is present in. That is, the intent is to have something like this: class MyView(View): def get(self, request, *args, **kwargs): context_instance = RequestContext(self.request) context_instance.update({ 'photo': Photo.objects.filter(id=1, uploader=request.user), }) return render_to_resp (request=self.request, template='my_template.html', context=context_instance) However, this is not working. The reference photo does not show up in the context at all. What is the proper way of doing this? A: Why not create a method for it. class Photo(models.Model): uploader = models.ForeignKey('account.User') def render_as_user(self): #do your thing here return self and then class MyView(View): def get(self, request, *args, **kwargs): context_instance = RequestContext(self.request) context_instance.update({
