Atherosclerotic plaques which form on the luminal surface of arterial blood vessels may be classified into several types of lesions. One type of lesion is a fibrofatty plaque, which comprises a fibrous cap lined by macrophages and foam cells and a large amount of lipid-filled foam cells embedded in a fibrous matrix. Such lesions are frequently referred to as "vulnerable," or "low-grade," because of the potentially high risk of rupture. Another type of lesion is a fibrolipid plaque, which comprises a fibrous cap lined by smooth muscle cells and foam cells and a large amount of lipid-filled foam cells embedded in a fibrous matrix. In the C-H activation process of benzoic acids by a nickel complex, the concomitant lability of the generated benzyne intermediate is likely caused by the transition from the π-donor to the σ-acceptor nature of the benzyne intermediate via the π-π∗ transition. To clarify the concomitant effect of the phenyl groups, the sulfur K-edge X-ray absorption near edge structure (XANES) of nickel benzoic acid complexes with various N-substituted benzylamines was measured. The experimental data were interpreted by using density functional calculations, and the results suggested that the contribution from the π-π∗ transition in the π-donor benzyne intermediate state in the benzoic acid reaction is dependent on the number of phenyl rings, the orbital character of the associated frontier orbital in the π-donor state, and the ruffling effect of the phenyl rings in the π-donor benzyne intermediate state. These findings provide a clear molecular picture of the origin of the concomitant lability of benzyne intermediates, and 6d1f23a050
