Field of the Invention The invention relates to a color conversion circuit, and in particular to a color conversion circuit which converts a NTSC (National Television System Committee) signal to a PAL (Phase Alternation by Line) or SECAM signal. 2. Description of the Prior Art In a video signal processing circuit, when a television signal is processed, it is necessary to convert it from one standard to another. For example, when broadcasting in an area in which a foreign country wishes to air the popular entertainment programs on a television channel, it is necessary to convert such a signal into the broadcasting standard (PAL or SECAM) of such a foreign country. In addition, when the television signal is received by a television receiver, it is necessary to convert the PAL or SECAM signal into the television signal standard of the country in which the signal is received. For example, in Europe and North America, PAL and SECAM signals are used, while in Japan, the NTSC signal is used. Accordingly, when broadcasting television programs in Japan from a satellite or broadcasting center in North America, it is necessary to convert a broadcast signal into the NTSC signal in Japan. Further, a television receiver for receiving television signals broadcasts by satellites is provided with a receiving part which receives a satellite signal and a satellite receiving part which is connected to the receiving part and receives a signal from a satellite to convert a broadcasting standard of Japan into the PAL or SECAM signal of Europe or North America. In order to perform such a conversion, a color conversion circuit is provided which comprises a matrix circuit including a plurality of memory locations which are electrically connected to each other through diodes and through fuses or the like. The color conversion circuit sets the number of lines of the PAL or SECAM signal according to the number of lines of the NTSC signal. More specifically, the color conversion circuit sets the number of lines to the NTSC signal according to 6d1f23a050
