Here's what I want to do: I have several entities that I want to store. I would like to avoid the huge number of fields associated with each entity. After seeing a webcast on EF I think the way to do this is to use a set data source in a one-to-many relation. That is, each of my entities will be in a table that has a one to many relation to my entities table. From there, I will be able to query the data that I want. Is this the best way to go about this? I have an old DbContext/EF 4.0 based application that I'm upgrading to 5.0. A: Yes. Here are some things to consider. Tables Check that your entity tables have a PK/FK relationship (see the PK/FK section below). Edm: If your class has a "OneToMany" navigation property, you will see it generate a new "edmx_table_Namespace_EntityName_Id" property on the entity class. You can control the naming of these properties by setting the "AlternateKey" property for the OneToMany property. OneToMany : true - The "Id" properties is provided and used as the "AlternateKey" 6d1f23a050
